

Some History Revisited

By Jim Thomas
Media Bypass
November 1998

Aversion of the "Golden Rule" reads: "He who owns the gold makes the rules." That statement has been and will always be true. This has been particularly exemplified by the Rothschilds' banking interest in Germany, England, the United States and other countries.

Amschel Mayer Rothchild gained control of the Bank of England, after which he began making laws for that empire and the Colonies of America. The Colonies operated on a paper currency called "script" in the conduct of commerce, until such was outlawed by laws passed in England — resulting in the script being devalued considerably.

This caused economic turmoil, exacerbating revolutionary tensions. The American Revolution was exemplified by the so-called Boston Tea Party, in which colonists dressed as Indians boarded an English tea cargo vessel and dumped English tea into Boston Harbor. This display was a protest against these new monetary laws of England.

When the script was turned in as required by law, colonists who owned the script were paid only 50 percent of its face value. Colonists were then forced to use the bankers' money — at interest, of course.

This same situation again occurred during the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, on April 5, 1933, when the bankers ordered him to confiscate all the gold holding belonging to Americans. The bankers took all the gold and prepared to issue "fiat" — worthless currency now known as Federal Reserve Notes.

There was a period of time between the signing of the Declaration of Independence and the present when Americans were allowed to own their own money. But the banking monopoly has prevailed in quashing that practice.

The Founding Fathers of the United States, meeting at Philadelphia in 1787, considered the importance of bringing in some form of legislation which would protect them against their exploitation from the international Bankers. Article I, Section 8, paragraph 5 of the New American Constitution reads: "Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof."

All laws passed since then are supposed to conform to the provisions of that sacred document. The fact is, subsequent legislation dealing with finance and currency has violated the supreme law of the land. This shows how powerful the banking cartel really is. They control the money and they can make the laws even if they are contrary to the Constitution.

International bankers are rarely satisfied with just accumulating interest from commerce. They find wars very profitable and often finance both sides. They also like periods of prosperity where everyone of any worth is mortgaged to the hilt then orders are given to tighten credit, recall outstanding loans, and reduce the currency in circulation. Then an artificial depression is created. This situation is cycled over and over again and yet most Americans fail to realize who has taken them to the poverty level. History continues to repeat itself.

The stage is now set for such circumstances to occur on a world basis instead of just one country. The bankers' profits will be much greater. Most of the modern-day bankers have the image of "Mr. Nice Guys." They don't have to do much dirty work because they have thousands of hired hands to do their dirty work. Those include Congressmen, Internal Revenue agents, judges, sheriffs, prosecutors, and county officials.

I was just offered a really big small-business loan by my friendly local bank. It was big to me, but small for the Government. The Government guarantees those loans but they also wanted me to put up collateral for the loan. In other words: no risk for the bank. They would lend me credit which they have plenty of but no money because they do not have much of. it. I told them where to get off!

I like the story of the Native American that went to the bank to borrow $500 to go into business selling beads and jewelry. The banker asked about his collateral. The Indian asked: What's that? The banker explained that he had to put up something of value for the loan.

The Indian said that he had an old truck and a horse without teeth. The banker decided that he would make the loan without collateral. Later the borrower came in to pay off the $500 and explained that business was good. In fact, he had a pocket full of money. The banker asked: What are going to do with all that money? The reply was: Put in my Teepee. The banker then said that he should leave it with him for safekeeping. The Indian asked: "What is your collateral?"

It's a one-way street, is it not? When will Americans wake up and throw out those rascals? There is no law against having or creating your own money system. States cannot do that, but the people can. As long as we use their money we will be their slaves! Has anyone taken the money scheme to a grand jury? Why not? Why allow a private corporation to control our economy and our Nation? Did Congress violate its oath of office when they passed the Federal Reserve Act? Should it not be held accountable? Think about it!

About the author: Jim Thomas, publisher of Media Bypass magazine, is also director of the Tri-State Redemption Center specializing in the circulation of NORFED [National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act] American Liberty Currency. For information on NORFED, call 1-888-421-6181.